MAXIMIZE THE QUALITY QUOTIENT

Consumers are increasingly prioritizing value when choosing where to eat.

76% of consumers say value is very important when deciding where to dine.

But value nowadays means more than just a low cost. Now, consumers are looking to other factors such as food quality, brand names, signature menu items and more.

23% of consumers say their definition of getting a good value at restaurants has changed over the past two years; food quality and service are increasingly equated with good value.

HERE ARE 3 WAYS TO MAXIMIZE CONSUMERS' PERCEPTION OF VALUE.

FEATURE BRAND-NAME INGREDIENTS ON MENU ITEMS

of consumers say they would be more likely to purchase restaurant menu items that feature brand-name items versus unbranded ingredients.

TIP: For condiments, dips and dressings, be sure brands (and their logos) are visible so customers quickly recognize them; this may make menu items more appealing.

2 CALL OUT QUALITY ON MENUS

77%

of consumers say food quality is important in creating value at restaurants. 62% of consumers say they are seeking out higherquality menu options than they were two years ago.

TIP: Use quality-signifying language on menus; words or phrases such as "natural ingredients," "house-made" or "organic" all add to consumers' perception of quality—and in turn, value.

CONSIDER OTHER VALUE-CREATING FACTORS

Beyond branded ingredients and quality food, other attributes consumers agree create value include:

Freshness:
	72%
Portion size:
	59%
Variety:
	42%
Customization:
	23%
Uniqueness:
	15%

TIP: Offer signature or limited-time menu items to generate buzz and highlight uniqueness; consider offering meals in varying portion sizes to suit all appetites; and offer add-ons such as artisanal cheese and other toppings/ingredients, premium breads and brandname condiments and dips.

DON'T MISS THIS

Don't worry too much about pricing changes:

72%

of operators say that raising menu prices has had no impact on their traffic compared to two years ago, and 14% say traffic actually went up. Just 13% of operators say they had a decrease in traffic.

TIP: If bumping up quality and using brand name ingredients warrants it, raising prices can help bridge the gap, and operators won't have to be concerned about losing business.
